Compounds from mushroom can combat Covid-19: Study

AAT News Service... NATURAL anti-infective, antiviral, anti-inflammatory, and antithrombotic products derived from a wide range of easily-sourced mushrooms and their bioactive molecules. In the review article the scientists have assessed the roles and mechanisms of 13 different mushroom-derived bioactive compounds in preventing SARS-CoV-2 infection and the pathophysiology associated with its infection, such as lung infection, inflammation, cytokine storm, and thrombotic and cardiovascular effects. Their study said that mushrooms contain bioactive polysaccharides and compounds with immune-modulating, antiviral, antibacterial, antifungal, and other medicinal properties. It also said that mushroom-based drugs are being tested in human trials, with promising results against SARS-CoV-2. The main advantages of using edible mushroom against viral infections are that they can be used as a nutraceutical supplement with no side-effects and can act as an immunity booster. The study in the Journal of Fungi also suggests that there are huge opportunities for better understanding the role of mushroom-derived bioactive compounds by in-depth pre-clinical and clinical studies. In this regard a co-ordination between researcher, health professionals, and policymakers are warranted.
